THE PATTERSON HORACES

When the Emperor Augustus sat with Virgil on one side and Horace on the other, the two poetic glories of his reign, and the two writers who were to commend his name to immortality in literature, he little dreamed of the influence their poems were to have on later ages,— Virgil especially in medieval times and Horace as the favorite Latin poet of the modern world. It is fortunate that Princeton possesses the stately collection of Morgan Virgils and the beautiful collection of Patterson Horaces, the latter the gift of Robert W. Patterson of the Class of 1876.

Here the lover of Horace may find many a volume of artistic beauty and historical interest. Here he may pick up Wordsworth's copy and recall his saying: "Horace is my great favorite. I love him dearly", or he may read in the copy of Mrs. Browning, or of the poet Gray, or of Gladstone; and if he wishes royal company, he may read in the volumes which belonged to Louis XIV and Louis XV of France, who perhaps admired their copies more than they read them. There are also five manuscripts in the Patterson collection, not of great authority, and yet samples of the way Horace looked to the eyes of a reader in the Middle Ages. A pleasant hour can be spent in such company, and if the visitor who takes one or another copy to inspect can linger long enough to read a little, he will renew his acquaintance with the most human, most winning and most modern of all the Latin poets.
